

The time has come to put down your keg and move on to other things. At this point your neighbor has consumed two beers, the perfect number to facilitate the lifting of two six packs, which brings us to the renowned Six Lager Lift. Stand up and brush yourself off. Refer to Pint Pulls for correct procedure. However, be aware that doing the Six Lager Lift can confer an additional benefit as your neighbor can now move on to the next task at hand – which we'll get to - while you exercise. Indeed, now might be the time for you to offer him a third beer – unless you are concerned that he might jeopardize his life while working with electricity.

On the other hand, conservation of resources is always wise. If you feel that this principle applies, we suggest shooing your neighbor out the door. Save that rewiring job for his next visit. Now return to your house and go lounge in your recliner, beer in hand. You've earned it. When your spouse asks where you've been, nonchalantly mention that you fixed all the broken items in your garage while your hard working neighbor watched and drank all your beer. Tell her if she has anything else that needs fixing to put it in the garage and you'll take care of it during the next session. Along with the wiring. Now ask your spouse for a massage. Switch on remote.

Dubbel Your Deltoids

Usually, following the natural course of events, before you run out of chores your neighbor will run out on you. (Whether or not your spouse has, or will, run out on you is another topic altogether, and with few exceptions is beyond the scope of this otherwise remarkably comprehensive book.) This time you may have to bribe your neighbor into coming over.

Or you may need to find another hardworking neighbor. Maybe even someone who has just moved into the neighborhood and needs to know about your reputation as a connoisseur and purveyor of fine beer. In any case, we recommend you choose a neighbor with an engineering degree.
